My interests primarily lies in an epistemological framing of mining in the Visayas, Philippines. I pay particular attention to the historically-situated context of mining by focusing on epistemology, patronage politics, everyday violence, archipelagos, human geography, political and eco-theology, social and legal theory, world-systems analysis, Bisayan studies, counter-mapping, and participatory research. My practice centers Bisayan epistemologies and lived experiences around mining that tend to be obscured. I work with text, maps, images, audio, and video recordings, including primary interviews and legal documents, which become source material for academic texts, public scholarship, and multimedia projects. While my main focus is the island province of Cebu, my interests span a broader archipelagic context across Southeast Asia and Oceania. I live on the traditional and unceded ancestral homelands of the Acjachemen and Tongva Nations now known as Irvine in Orange County, California.
